

Katharine McGuinness

“A Monotype is really a painting done by the artist, in my case with lithography inks, onto a printing plate. This painting is then transferred onto 100% rag paper through an etching press. I work on a drawing composition first, then use that composition as a basis for creating a series of works repeating or changing colors as design elements as I go. Some images may be similar to each other, but each is painted onto the plate freeform by my own hand, with ever changing color and technique. There is no edition; each piece is unique.”

From the Press

“Kate McGuinness passionately loves her work and the process involved. She is truly one of the most passionate artists I have met in a long time. When asked why she chose printmaking over painting, she quickly responded, ‘I love ink, I always have.’ McGuinness’ provocative compositions represent pure spontaneity. Her art is dazzling.”
